Over 2,000 years ago, a disease appeared in Egypt and caused a large number of people to die. The disease was smallpox, and the battle against this disease eventually led to the development of vaccines. In early 18th-century Europe, material from smallpox sores was given to people who had never had the disease through scratches on the arm. The healthy person would develop mild symptoms of the disease and then immunity. This worked pretty well, but up to three percent of people still died after
